C.

C (sī), the third letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally identical with the Greek Gamma, Γ, and Semitic Gimel, whence it derived its form through the successive types Γ, ☾, C. The Greek Kappa, K, being from the first little used by the Romans, C functioned in earlier Latin both as (g) and (k); the latter sound being the more frequent came to be viewed as the more appropriate to C, and about 300–230 B.C., a modified character, Ɔ or G, was introduced for the (g) sound, and C itself retained for the (k) sound. Hence, in the classical period and after, G was treated as the phonetic representative of Gamma, and C as the equivalent of Kappa, in the transliteration of Greek words into Roman spelling, as in ΚΑΔΜΟΣ, ΚΥΡΟΣ, ΦΩΚΙΣ, in Roman letters CADMVS, CYRVS, PHOCIS.

When the Roman alphabet was introduced into Britain, C had only the sound (k); and this value of the letter has been retained by all the insular Celts: in Welsh, Irish, Gaelic, C, c, is still only = (k). The Old English or 'Anglo-Saxon' writing was learned from the Celts, apparently of Ireland; hence C, c, in Old English, was also originally = (k); the words kin, break, broken, thick, seek, were in OE. written cyn, brecan, brocen, picc, sēoc. But during the course of the OE. period, the k-sound before e and i became palatalized, and had by the 10th c. advanced nearly or quite to the sound of (tʃ), though still written c, as in cir(i)ce, wrecc(e)a. On the continent, meanwhile, a similar phonetic change had also been going on. Original Latin C (=k) before e, i, had by palatalization advanced in Italy to the sound of (tʃ), and in France still further to that of (ts). Yet for these new sounds the old character C, c, was still retained before e and i, the letter thus acquiring two distinct values. Moreover the sound (k) also occurred in French before e and i (chiefly as a representative of Latin qu); this was now expressed in Northern French by the Greek letter K, k; so that the sound (k) had two symbols, k and c, while the symbol c had two sounds (k and ts). These French inconsistencies as to C and K were, after the Norman Conquest, applied to the writing of English, which caused a considerable re-spelling of the Old English words. Thus while OE. candel, clif, corn, crop, cū, remained unchanged, Cent, cēg (cēg), cyng, brece, sēoce, were now (without any change of sound) spelt Kent, kei, kyng, breke, seoke; even cniht was subsequently spelt knikt, knight, and pic, picc, became thik, thikk, thick. The OE. cw- was also at length (very unnecessarily) displaced by the Fr. qw, qu, so that the OE. cwēn, cwic, became ME. qwen, quen, qwik, quik, now queen, quick. The sound (tʃ) to which OE. palatalized c had advanced, also occurred in French, chiefly (in Central French) from Latin c before a. In French it was represented by ch, as in champ, cher:—L. camp-um, cār-um; and this spelling was now introduced into English: the Hatton Gospels, written about 1160, have in Matt. i–iii, child, chyld, riche, mychel, for the cild, rice, mycel, of the OE. version whence they were copied: this was, phonetically, an improvement. (In these cases, the OE. c gave place to k, qu, ch; But, on the other hand, c in its new value of (ts) came in largely in Fr. words like procession, emperice, grace, and was also substituted for ts in a few OE. words, as miltse, bletsien, in early ME. milce, blecien. By the end of the 13th c. both in France and England, this sound (ts) was reduced to simple (s); and from that date c before e, i, y, has been, phonetically, a duplicate or subsidiary letter to s; used either for 'etymological' reasons, as in lance, cent, or (in defiance of etymology) to avoid the ambiguity due to the 'etymological' use of s for (z), as in ace, mice, once, pence, defence.

Thus, on the plea of showing the etymology, we write advise, devise, instead of advize, devize, which obliges us to write advice, device, dice, ice, mice, twice, etc., in defiance of the etymology; bad example has extended this to hence, pence, defence, etc., where there is no plea whatever for c. Former generations also wrote sence for sense.

Hence, in modern English, C has (1) the 'hard' sound (k) before a, o, u, before a consonant (except h), and when final, as in cab, cot, cut, claw, crow, acme, cycle, sac, tic, epic; (2) before e, i, y, it has the 'soft' sound (s). In all words from Old English or Old French, final c is avoided: the (k) sound being written k or ck, as in beak, meek, oak, book, bark, balk, bank, pack, peck, pick, rock. This is probably due to the claims of derivatives like meeker, oaken, barking, rocky, where c could not be used. Final c however is written in modern words from Latin, Greek, or other languages, and (of late) in the ending -ic, as in sac, tic, epic, critic, music, pic-nic. In the rare cases in which this c is followed in inflexion by e or i, it is necessary to change it to ck, as in physicking, mimicking, frolicking, trafficker, pic-nicker. When the (s) sound is final, it must be written -ce, as in trace, ice, thrice, and this final e must be retained in composition before a, o, u, as in trace-able, peace-able. (3) Ci (rarely ce) preceding another vowel has frequently the sound of (ʃ), esp. in the endings -cious, -cial, -cion, as atrocious, glacial, coercion (ocean). This sound (which is also taken by t in the same position) has been developed in comparatively modern times by palatalization of (s).

In a few words from foreign languages, c retains the foreign pronunciation, as in It. cicerone (tʃitʃerō'ne).

The combination CH virtually constitutes a distinct letter, having a history and sound of its own, and as such it receives a separate place in the alphabet of some languages, e.g. Spanish, Welsh. In English it is not so treated, and the CH- words are placed in Dictionaries and alphabetical lists between Ce- and Ci-. This inclusion of CH in the middle of C is one reason why the latter occupies so large a space in the Dictionary: C is virtually two letters in one, since beside the series ca-, ce-, ci-, cl-, etc., there is the parallel series cha-, che-, chi-, chl-, etc. For the history and sounds of CH, see before the beginning of the Ch- words.

b. in Hist. applied spec. to the five ministers of Charles II, who signed the Treaty of Alliance with France for war against Holland in 1672: these were Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Ashley (Earl of Shaftesbury), and Lauderdale, the initials of whose names thus arranged chanced to spell the word cabal.

This was merely a witticism referring to sense 6; in point of fact these five men did not constitute the whole 'Cabal', or Committee for Foreign Affairs; nor were they so closely united in policy as to constitute a 'cabal' in sense 5, where quot. 1670 shows that three of them belonged to one 'cabal' or clique, and two to another. The name seems to have been first given to the five ministers in the pamphlet of 1673 'England's Appeal from the private Cabal at White-hall to the Great Council of the nation..by a true lover of his country.' Modern historians often write loosely of the Buckingham-Arlington administration from the fall of Clarendon in 1667 to 1673 as the Cabal Cabinet or Cabal Ministry.

These ministers were therefore emphatically called the Cabal; and they soon made that appellation so infamous that it has never since their time been used except as a term of reproach.

7. a. As a specific use of 3: The private room in which the confidential advisers of the sovereign or chief ministers of a country meet; the council-chamber. Originally in the literal sense; now taken chiefly for what goes on or is transacted there, i. e. political consultation and action, as 'the field' is taken for 'fighting, warlike action'.

Formerly called more fully the Cabinet Council, as distinguished from the Privy Council, and as meeting in the cabinet; the later abbreviation is like the use of 'the House', 'the field', for those who fill or frequent it, and would be encouraged by such expressions as 'he is of the cabinet' used of Vane by Roe, 1630. Member of the cabinet is later.

Cabir, obs. form of Caber.

Cabish, obs. form of Cabbage.

Cable (kē·b'l), sb. Forms: 3–4 kable, 5–7 cabul(le, cabyl, -il, -ille, -el, -ell, -elle, (5–6 gable, gabyll), 3– cable. [ME. cable, cabel, kable, identical with Du. kabel, MDu. cābel, MLG. kabel, MHG. and Ger. kabel, all app. from Romanic: cf. F. câble, Sp. cable, Pg. cabre, all meaning 'cable', It. cappio sliding knot, noose, gin:—late L. capulum, caplum a halter for catching or fastening cattle, according to Isidore f. capĕre to take 'quod eo indomita jumenta comprehendantur': cf. capulum, -us, 'handle, haft', capulā·re to take, catch, etc.

(There are difficulties as to F. câble, older forms of which were caable, chaable, chéable, châble, which point, through cadable*, to a L. catabola* a kind of Ballista for hurling stones, etc., in which sense chaable also occurs: see Cabulus in Du Cange. Littré supposes an early confusion between this and cable* from Isidore's capulum; others think that as the catabola was put in motion with ropes, it may be the real source. But this does not account for the Sp. and It. words.)]

1. A strong thick rope, originally of hemp or other fibre, now also of strands of iron wire.

Originally a stout rope of any thickness, but now, in nautical use, a cable (of hemp, jute, etc.) is 10 inches in circumference and upwards; ropes of less thickness being called cablets or hawsers. In other than nautical use (see 2), rope is commonly used when the material is hemp or fibre (as in the 'rope' by which a train is drawn up an incline), and cable when the material is wire.

Paul Meyer rejects Littré's guess from Sp. cabo cape, headland, as if 'to sail from cape to cape', as untenable phonetically and historically, and thinks the verb must be from the name of a kind of boat. The gloss 'cabo, trabe, nave' occurs in (MS. Bibl. Nat. 1646 lf. 83 b) a 13th c. copy of an older glossary; and Littré has cabot, chabot as north French equivalents of sabot, which is still applied to a small vessel running two or three knots an hour. (Brachet guesses that caboter may be from the surname Cabot; which may have had the same origin, but cf. prec.)]

Caco- representing Gr. κακο- combining form of κακός bad, evil, forming many compounds in Greek, some of which, like cacochymy, cacodæmon, cacoethes, cacophony, have reached English through Latin (and French); others have been adapted directly from Greek in modern times (as cacology, cacotrophy); others have been formed on Greek analogies from their elements. Compounds of Greek and Latin, as cacodorous = malodorous, and the medical cacosomnia (sleeping badly) are exceptional. Occasionally caco- is used in looser or casual combination with words of Greek derivation, which may have been modelled on cacodæmon, as in caco-magician, cacotype. It is very freely used in medical terminology to form names of bad states of bodily organs, but most of these are not English in form, e.g. cacogala·ctia (a condition in which the milk is bad), cacoglossia (putrid state of the tongue), cacomorphia (malformation or deformity), caconychia (morbid state of the nails), cacopharyngia (a putrid condition of the pharynx), cacophthalmia (malignant inflammation of the eyes), cacoplasia (formation of diseased structures from a depraved condition of the system), cacopneumonia, cacorrhachitis (disease of the vertebral column), cacothymia (disordered state of mind), cacotrichia (disease of the hair), etc.

Cade (kēd), sb.[2] (a.) Also 5 kod, 5-7 cad. [Origin and part of speech unknown. In cade lamb, 'cade' may be an adj. with some such sense as 'cast' or 'domestic, tame', or a sb. used attrib. as in pet-lamb: in the former case 'cade' as a sb. would be short for 'cade-lamb'; in the latter, 'cade-lamb' might be an expansion.

(As Cotgrave gives an alleged F. 'cadel a castling, a starveling, one that hath need much of cockering and pampering', a sense not unlike Eng 'pet', it has been suggested that cade-lamb was perh. for an earlier cadel-lamb*. But this is historically impossible. M. Paul Meyer says Cotgrave's word is not Fr., but app. the 16th c. Languedocien cadel 'little dog', and his explanation erroneous. The corresp. OF. word was chael, cheel, which has no likeness to the ME. kod, cad, even if the sense suited. Wedgwood compares Da. kaad wanton, petulant, sportive:—ON. kát-r merry, cheerful: but cade is not at all Sc., and apparently not properly northern, since Ray 1691 explains the 'North-Country words' pet, pet-lamb as 'a cade-lamb.')]

Cairn (kēɔɹn). Also 6–8 carne, 8 cairne, kairn, 8–9 carn. [mod.Sc. form (cf. bairn, wairn, airm, etc.) of earlier carn, a. Gaelic carn masc. 'heap of stones'. Found in Lowland Sc. early in 16th c., and thence recently in Eng., as a term of prehistoric archæology, and more widely and popularly in connexion with the piles of stones used or raised by Ordnance Surveyors. The direct Eng. representative of the Celtic would be carn, which is common on the Ordnance maps of Wales, and in local use with tourists in Wales.

The word is found in all the Celtic langs.; OIrish carn, carnn, carnd occurs as neuter; Welsh, beside carn fem. 'heap', has carn masc. 'hoof' and 'haft of knife', etc., indicating an earlier sense 'horn'. If these are to be identified, the word must be = the recorded Gaulish karn-on neut. 'horn'; in which case the primary sense would apparently be 'cairn on a mountain top' i. e. the 'horn' on its 'head'; which is quite possible, though not certain. The word enters into the names of various mountains in Scotland and Wales. Welsh has also the collective derivative carnedd, as in Carnedd Llewelyn, etc.]

A genus of plants, Cajanus (N. O. Leguminosæ), and esp. the species C. Indicus, a shrub native to the East Indies, but now naturalized in Africa, tropical America, and Polynesia, for the sake of the seeds or pulse, an esteemed article of food, called in India Dhal, Dhol, and Urhur, and in Jamaica Pigeon-peas, of which the No-eye pea and Congo pea are varieties.

Cajaput, cajeput, variants of CAJUPUT.

Cajole (kădʒō·ul), v. Also 7 caiole, cageole, cajoul, 7–8 cajol. [a. F. cajoler, in same sense, of uncertain origin and history.

Paré c 1550 has 'cageoller comme un gay' to chatter like a jay. Littré has 16th c. examples of cajoler, cajoller, cageoller, in the senses 'to chatter like a jay or magpie', and 'to sing', also, in the modern sense 'to cajole'. Cotgr. 1611 has cajoler, cageoler 'to prattle or jangle like a jay (in a cage), to bable or prate much to little purpose'. Most etymologists taking cageoler as the original form, have inferred its derivation from cage cage, through an assumed dim. cageole*. This is doubtful both in regard to sense and form; the early meaning 'to chatter like a jay' does not very obviously arise from cage, and does not clearly give rise to the modern sense. The Fr. dim. of cage is not cageole* but geôle 'gaol', whence F. enjôler (OF. engaioler, engaueler, Sp. enjaular) 'to put in gaol, imprison', also 'to inveigle, entice, allure, enthrall by fair words, cajole'. In Namur, cajoler has the sense enjoliver, to make joli, whence Grandgagnage would refer it to the stem jol- of joli, with 'prefix ca- frequent in Walloon with an iterative force'. It is possible that two or even three words are here confused; in the modern sense, F. cajoler is synonymous with enjôler above, and if not cognate with that word, its sense has probably at least been taken over from it by form-association of cageoler or cajoler with enjôler. But the working out of the history must be left to French etymologists.]

Calamine (kæ·lămoin). [a. F. calamine, ad. med.L. calamīna, app. (like the Ger. galmei, formerly kalmei:—calmīa) corrupted by the alchemists from L. cadmīa, Gr. καδμεία, καδμία, 'calamine'.

Agricola supposed the name to be from calamus reed, in allusion to the slender stalactitic forms common in the cadmia fornacum (oxide of zinc from furnace chimneys).]

An ore of zinc: originally applied, like med.L. lapis calaminaris, and the cadmia of Pliny, to both the carbonate $ZnCO_3$, and the hydrous silicate Zn_2SiO_4, H_2O but chiefly, in France and England, to the former, which is an abundant and important English ore of zinc. The silicate, found in Carinthia, Hungary, Belgium, New Jersey, etc., is distinguished as Siliceous or Electric Calamine.

The chemical difference between the two ores was established by Smithson in 1802; in 1807 Brongniart unfortunately chose calamine as the mineralogical name of the silicate, leaving the other ore as zinc carbonatée, which Beudant in 1832 named SMITHSONITE. This nomenclature is followed by Dana. But common English and French use (see Littré) continued to apply the name calamine to the carbonate; and in conformity with this Brooke and Miller in 1852 reversed Beudant's use of calamine and smithsonite. With British mineralogists, chemists, miners, and manufacturers, calamine therefore means the carbonate.

Calamity (kălæ·mĭti). Also 5-6 calamyte, 6-7 calamitie. [a. F. calamité, f. L. calamitāt-em (nom. calamitas), damage, disaster, adversity; by Latin writers associated with calamus straw, corn-stalk, etc., in the sense of damage to crops from hail, mildew, etc. But there is difficulty in reconciling this with the force of the suffix, which etymologically could give only some such sense as 'the quality of being a calamus, reed, or straw' (cf. cīvitas, auctoritas, bonitas); hence some would refer it to a lost calamis* 'injured, damaged', whence incolumis 'uninjured, sound'.

Bacon (Sylva § 669) thus fancifully etymologized the word 'Another ill accident is drouth, at the spindling of the corn, which with us is rare, but in hotter countries common; insomuch as the word calamitas was first derived from calamus, when the corn could not get out of the stalke.']

Since calma in OSp. and Pg. means also 'heat of the day', Diez, comparing mod. Pr. chaume 'resting-time of the cattle', and Rumansch calma, cauma 'a shady resting-place for cattle', thought calma possibly derived from late L. cauma (occurring in Vulg., Job xxx. 30), a. Gr. καῦμα 'burning heat, fever heat, heat of the sun, heat of the day', used also in med.L. of the burning heat of the sun. Taken in connexion with the senses of the Rumansch and Provençal words this gives the possible development of meaning 'burning heat, heat of the day, rest during the heat of the day, quiet, stillness'; but it is notable that It. calma has no sense of 'heat', only 'a calme, or quiet faire weather' (Florio). As to the phonetic change of au to al, Diez suggested popular assoc. with calēre to be hot, calor heat, which Schuchardt also (Romania IV. 255) thinks probable; the latter has given other instances of the phonetic change in Vokalismus des Vulgärlateins I. 494–6 and III. 316.]

Littré says 'so called, it is said, because the chemist who discovered it, saw a beautiful black powder change into a white powder in the preparation.' Chambers (Cycl. 1727–51) s.v. says The denomination Calomel rather seems to have first belonged to the Æthiops mineral; from καλος, pulcher, fair; and μελας, niger, black: for that white or pale bodies, rubbed herewith, become black. Some will have it first given to Mercurius dulcis, by a whimsical chymist, who employed a black in his laboratory; whose complexion, as well as that of the mercury, he alluded to in the term: the medicine being fair, the operator black.' Nothing appears as to when, where, or by whom the name was given: Littré calls it 'ancien nom'.]

(Etymologically, incorrect in form, and not expressing the fact to which it is applied.)] A name applied (Jan. 1865) by Prof. Tyndall to the change of non-luminous heat-rays into rays of higher refrangibility so as to become luminous. See also CALCESCENCE.

1865 TYNDALL Heat xiii. (1870) § 617 To express this transmutation of heat rays into others of higher refrangibility, I propose the term calorescence. 1869 — *Notes Lect. The refrangibility of the rays is, in fact, exalted. 1881 Nature XXIV. 66 Akin gave the name of calcescence.. but the term has been superseded by Tyndall's term calorescence, which is etymologically unfortunate, seeing that the Latin verb is calesco, not caloresco.

3. Of a glacier or iceberg: To detach and throw off a mass of ice. Cf. CALF sb.[1] 6, and CALVE v.[2]

LANSDELL Through Siberia I. 199 The icebergs 'calved' as they went along, with much commotion and splashing.

Calve, v.[2] dial. [Of uncertain standing and derivation. It is possible that (kāv) is merely an earlier pronunciation of cave retained locally; but it is notable that calve in coincides in form and sense with W.Flemish in-kalven (cf. de gracht kalft in 'the ditch caves in' De Bo), in which the root part is the same as in Du. af-kalven, to fall or break away, uit-kalven to fall or shoot out, said of the sides of a cutting or the like. De Vries refers this -kalven to kalve, kaluwe, surface of the ground, surface layer or soil (see CALLOW). In-kalven would thus signify the shooting in of the surface or earth above. Some, however, think that the word is, in its origin, identical with the preceding. The evidence is not decisive.

Calve (kāv, kǫv) in, is the vernacular form in Lincolnshire, Notts, Hunts, Norfolk, and adjacent parts of Suffolk, Cambridge, Leicester, Derby, and Yorkshire. Wesley, who is quoted for it, was a native of Epworth, in the district covered by Mr. E. Peacock's Gloss. of Manley and Corringham, North Lincolnshire. Assuming the word to be from Dutch, it has been suggested that it was 'introduced by the Dutch navvies who came over for the large drainage works in the Lincolnshire fens' (Wedgwood).]

2. Geol. A name given by Sedgwick in 1836 to a group or 'system' of Palæozoic rocks lying below the Silurian, in Wales and Cumberland.

As originally defined, the Silurian of Murchison and Cambrian of Sedgwick, being established in different districts, were found on further investigation to overlap each other; the Cambrian is now generally held to include the Tremadoc slates, Lingula flags, Menevian beds, and Longmynd group, containing the Harlech grits and Llanberis slates; but the Geological Surveyors limit the term to the Longmynd group, while others extend it to include all the Lower Silurian of Murchison (Bala and Llandeilo groups).

L. camēl-us (-ellus), a. Gr. κάμηλ-ος, adopted from Semitic: Heb. and Phœn. גמל gāmāl; if of native Semitic origin, perh. f. vb. gāmal*, Arab. jamala to bear (Gesenius). In ME. affected by the OF. forms (see below).

The early Teutonic name for the camel was app. in some way identical (or rather, perhaps ultimately derived from a common source) with the Gr. ἐλέφας, ἐλέφαντα, L. elephant-us, elephant: viz. Gothic ulbandus (=ulv-), OHG. olbenta, MHG. olbent, OE. olfend, oluend, found in the Ags. Gospels, and coming down as late as Ormin in form OLFENT, q. v. But the Lindisfarne Gloss already in the 10th c. adopted the L. of the Vulgate as camel, camell-, which after the 12th c., helped by the influence of OF., became the only name. So in the other modern Teut. langs.: Ger. kameel, kamel, Du. kameel. The Romanic langs. follow two Latin types: (1) L. camēlus, whence ONF. cameil, OF. chameil, later camoil, chamoil (like vēla, veile, voile); (2) L. camellus, whence It. cammello, Sp. camello, ONF. camel, OF. chamel, modF. chameau (like bellus, bello, bel, beau). All the OF. forms appear in ME. (where cameil regularly became camayl); but the camel of OE. and ONF., being also most like the Latin, is the survivor.]

1. A large hornless ruminant quadruped, distinguished by its humped back, long neck, and cushioned feet; it is nowhere found wild, but is domesticated in Western Asia and Northern Africa, in the arid regions of which it is the chief beast of burden.

There are two distinct species, the Arabian or one-humped, and the Bactrian or two-humped; a lighter and fleeter variety of the former is known as the Dromedary.

2. techn. A machine for imparting additional buoyancy to vessels, and thus enabling them to cross bars, shoals, etc., otherwise impassable; also for raising sunken ships, removing rocks, etc.

It consists generally of two or more huge water-tight chests provided with plugs and pumps. Water is admitted in order to sink the chests into position, and they are then fitted and braced to the sides of the vessel, which they are sometimes shaped to fit. On pumping out the water the camels rise, bearing up the vessel along with them.

A precious stone having two layers of different colours, in the upper of which a figure is carved in relief, while the lower serves as a ground. For this purpose the ancients used the onyx, agate, etc., and especially the sardonyx, 'a variety of chalcedony, consisting of alternate parallel layers of white and red chalcedony', which was carved so as to leave a white figure in relief on a red ground. Thence extended to all lapidary's work of the same kind; and in modern times ('by abuse' Littré says) to similar carving in shells of molluscs, of which the inner stratum is differently coloured from the outer.

Camlet (kæ·mlĕt), sb. Forms: 5 chamlyt, chamelet(t, 5-6 chamlett, 5-7 cham(e)lot, 6 chambelot, 6-7 chamblet(t, 6-8 chamlet, 6-9 camblet, 7 chamolet, camelott, camlott, 7-8 camelot, 7-camlet. [app. immediately from French: Littré cites chamelot 13th c., camelot 16th c.; Cotgr. translates F. camelot, 'chamlet'; Du Cange has med. L. camelotum; Anglo-French statutes of Edward IV have chamelett, and the spelling with cham- was the prevalent one in English till after the Restoration. The ultimate origin is obscure; at the earliest known date the word was associated (by Europeans) with camel, as if stuff made of camel's hair; but there is reason to think it was originally the Arabic khamlat, from khaml; Marco Polo (ed. Yule) I. 248 (Skeat). Khaml, khamlat, is explained by Lane as 'the nap or pile or villous substance on the surface of cloth'; khamlat, by Johnson, as 'camelot, silk and camel's hair, also, all silk or velvet, especially pily and plushy'. According to Littré, the Journal officiel of 1874, p. 3220/1, says camelot is so called from the Arabic seil el kemel, the Angora goat; cf. CAMEL-YARN.]

A name originally applied to some beautiful and costly eastern fabric, afterwards to imitations and substitutes the nature of which has changed many times over. 'A kind of stuff originally made by a mixture of silk and camel's hair; it is now made with wool and silk' (J.). 'A light stuff, formerly much used for female apparel, made of long wool, hard spun, sometimes mixed in the loom with cotton or linen yarn' (Ure). It is uncertain whether it was ever made of camel's hair; but in the 16th and 17th c. it was made of the hair of the Angora goat.

According to Beck, Draper's Dict., 'In [the] production [of camlets], the changes have been rung with all materials in nearly every possible combination; sometimes of wool, sometimes of silk, sometimes of hair, sometimes of hair with wool or silk, at others of silk and wool warp and hair woof ..Those of our day have had cotton and linen introduced into their composition. They have been made plain and twilled, of single warp and weft, of double warp, and sometimes with double weft also'.

WGer. or OTeut. kampo-z* was presumably an early Germanic adoption of L. camp-us in its transferred sense 'field of contest or combat', also 'duel, fight, battle, war'; see CAMP sb.[2] The word was thoroughly at home in WGer., and gave origin to numerous derivatives, particularly the vb. kampjon; see KEMP v. and cf. KEMP sb.:—OE. cempa, WGer. kampjo-n = late L. campion-em CHAMPION. In ME. the word survived longest in the north, esp. as an archaism of alliterative verse.

(Kluge and others, however, claim the word as native Teutonic, mainly on the ground of the improbability that the Germans who had so many native words to designate war, should adopt a foreign designation; but they offer no satisfactory account of its etymology.)]

Although camp was the Norman form of champ, no trace of it appears in ME., which had only CHAMP from central OF., in the senses of 'field of duel or tournament' and heraldic 'field'. Camp was introduced early in the 16th c., from contemporary Fr. and with the sense castra, but was also at first used to render L. campus in other senses, as well as occasionally in the sense of the earlier champ 'field of combat'.

Littré supposed that the 16th century French use of camp was merely the literary adoption of the Picard form in a special sense; but evidently it was an adaptation of It. (or ? Sp.) campo, in a sense not used with F. champ.]

I. In the military sense.

1. The place where an army or body of troops is lodged in tents or other temporary means of shelter, with or without intrenchments. In common modern use the collection of tents, huts, and other equipments is the chief notion, the site being the 'camping-ground'; but as used of ancient works, Roman, British, Danish, etc., it usually means the intrenched and fortified site, within which an army lodged or defended itself; a modern intrenched camp includes both notions. The name is also given to a permanent station for the reception of troops, in order that they may be trained in manœuvring in large bodies, and in campaigning duties generally, as the camps at Aldershot, Shorncliffe camp, camp of Chalons.

Campaign (kæmpē·n). Also 7–8 campagne, 7 -agn, -aine, -aigne. [a. F. campagne country, open country, champaign, 'the field', campaign, which in the course of the 16th c. took the place of the earlier champagne in all its senses (except as the proper name of a French province). It was introduced into Eng. in the 17th c., and at first occasionally used in all the senses of the earlier CHAMPAIGN, but was at length differentiated, and restricted to the military sense, for which it is now the proper term. The forms campagna, -agnia, -ania were also in 17th c. use (see above).

Littré treats 16th c. Fr. campagne as a substitution of the northern or Picard dialect form for the Parisian champagne; but there can be no doubt that it was actually an adaptation of It. campagna (common in the military sense in 16th c., e.g. CARO Virgil's Æn. XII. 563 'Turno la campagna aprendo', Turnus opening the campaign), and may have been taken into F. first in military phraseology, and gradually extended to other senses, the advantage of a form which could not be confounded with the name of the province Champagne perhaps conducing to the result. For ultimate etymology see CHAMPAIGN, CAMPANIA.]

3. Mil. The continuance and operations of an army 'in the field' for a season or other definite portion of time, or while engaged in one continuous series of military operations constituting the whole, or a distinct part, of a war. (In Ger. Feldzug.)

The name arose in the earlier conditions of warfare, according to which an army remained in quarters (in towns, garrisons, fortresses, or camps) during the winter, and on the approach of summer issued forth into the open country (nella campagna, dans la campagne) or 'took the field', until the close of the season again suspended active operations. Hence the name properly signifying the 'being in the field', was also applied, now to the season or time during which the army kept the field, and now to the series of operations performed during this time. In the changed conditions of modern warfare, the season of the year is of much less importance, and a campaign has now no direct reference to time or season, but to an expedition or continuous series of operations bearing upon a distinct object, the accomplishment or abandonment of which marks its end, whether in the course of a week or two, or after one or more years. The history of the sense is seen in early Dictionaries; e. g.

1656 BLOUNT Glossogr. s.v., A word much used among Souldiers, by whom the next Campaine is usually taken for the next Summers Expedition of an Army, or its taking the field. 1721 BAILEY, Campain, [in Military Affairs] the space of time every Year, an Army continues in the Field, during a War. 1730-6 — A summer's war. 1755 JOHNSON, Campaign, the time for which any army keeps the field, without entering into quarters.

Common camphor ($C_{10}H_{16}O$) is prepared by distillation and sublimation from Camphora officinarum (Laurus Camphora), a tree indigenous to Java, Sumatra, Japan, etc., and from other lauraceous trees. Campion [2] (kæ·mpiən). Herb. Also 7 campian, 7–8 champion. [This name appears first in Lobel (1576) and Lyte (1578) applied to the 'Rose Campion' or 'Garden Campions' (Lychnis, now Agrostemma, coronaria), and the 'Wild Campions'—Red and White—(L. diurna, and vespertina). As the first was identical with the plant called by Dioscorides λυχνὶς στεφανωματική, in Lat. lychnis corōnāria, where the second word in both means 'of or fit for a crown, chaplet, or wreath', and the λυχνὶς is said by Theophrastus to have been used for garlands, the Eng. name has been conjectured to be identical with CAMPION [1] and = 'champion'.

But if so, we should have looked for some such name as 'Campions' flower' 'Campions' lychnis', and also that the name should have gone back to the 14th c. when the form 'campion' for 'champion' was in Eng. use. But of neither do we find any trace, and the conjecture must for the present be taken for what it is worth. The Dict. des Sciences du Nat. (1818) tome X, has 'Compagnon Blanc, nom vulgaire Lychnis dioica.' HÉRICHER, Philol. de la Flore de Normandie et d'Angleterre 18, has Red and White Campion, le rouge et le blanc Compagnon, but the age of these names and their relation to campion is very doubtful. Others have conjectured formation from campus field.]

The name of certain plants, species of the genus Lychnis: under the name Lyte included the cultivated Rose Campion, L. (Agrostemma Linn.) coronaria, and the wild Red and White Campions, L. diurna and L. vespertina. It is doubtful whether it was a popular name even of these. Later writers have extended it, with qualifications, to a number of allied species, as Campion of Constantinople, the Scarlet Lychnis (L. chalcedonica); Meadow Campion, the Ragged Robin, L. Flos Cuculi; Bladder Campion, Silene inflata; Corn C., the Corn Cockle, Agrostemma Githago; Moss Campion, Silene acaulis: these are only book-names.

Can (kæn), v.[1] irreg. (Forms: see below.) [A defective verb, belonging to the small but interesting group of Teutonic preterite-present verbs (now chiefly used as auxiliaries of tense, mood, or predication), in form characterized by having as their present tense an original preterite, which retains the preterite form but has come to have a present signification, and from which a new weak past tense has subsequently been developed. Cf. dare, etc. OE. cunnan, pres. Ind. can (cṗn), pa. cúðe (:—cunðe), is identical with OFris. kunna, kan, kunda (konda), OS. cunnan, can, consta, const, (Du. kunnen, kan, konde), OHG. kunnan, kan, kunda (konda), or kunsta (konsta), (Ger. können, kann, konnte), ON. kunna, kann, kunna (:—kunða), Goth. (and OTeut.) kunnan, kann, kunpa.—The OTeut. sense was 'to know, know how, be mentally or intellectually able', whence 'to be able generally, be physically able, have the power, L. posse'. Since the present was formally a preterite, its meaning 'I know' must have been derived from that of 'I have learned, I have attained to knowledge'; the original present stem being kin-n-* or ken-n-, pre-Teut. gen-n-: cf. Lith. zinaú I know, Zend ā-zaiñ-ti knowledge, OIr. pret. adgéin he knew. Beside this Teutonic has knê- (ablaut form knô-), WGer. knā-, whence OE. cnáwan to Know, OHG. ir-chnâ-an, bi-chnâ-an, to recognize, ûr-chnâ-t recognition (answering to a Goth. -knêps* fem.). This stem is widely diffused in the Aryan langs.; cf. L., Gr. gnô- in L. gnô-sco, Gr. γι-γνώ-σκω (ἔ-γνω-ν); OSlav. zna-ti to know; OIr. gnáth known. In Skr. the pres. has stem jan-, the preterite jñā, jānā́mi, jajñá'u.

It has been further thought that the root was originally related to the Aryan gen- (with by-forms gnā-, gnō-), to bring forth, produce, Skr. ja'nā́mi, pret. jajñ'úa, L., Gr. gen-, gi-gn- (see Kin, King); but if so, they were already differentiated in Old Aryan, and the nature of the connexion of sense has not been determined.]

Forms: α. 1 cúðe, 2–3 cuþe, kuthe, 3–5 cowþe, cowthe, (4 coth), 4–5 couþe, 4–6 couthe, (5 couȝthe), 4 north. cuþ, cuth, 4–6 couth, (also in 4–5 with k-); β. 4–6 coude, k-, 5–6 coud, 7–8 often cou'd; γ. 6 coulde, 6– could, (6 coold, 6–7 cold, 6– Sc. culd).

The current spelling is erroneous: l began to be inserted about 1525, app. in mechanical imitation of should and would, where an etymological l had become silent, so that these words now rimed with cood, and might better have been written shood, wood; cf. northern wad. In the sense know, the earlier form couth was retained longer.

†10. To can or con thank(s: to express or offer thanks, to thank: app. originally 'to acknowledge' or 'recognize' one's gratitude. [ME. thank cunne(n, OE. þonc cunnan, =þonc witan, in OS. thank witan, OHG. thank wizan. Cf. also Gr. χάριν εἰδέναι, (L. gratias meminisse), It. saper grado, Pr. saver grat, F. savoir gré, whence also in ME. to cunne gree, maulgre, to express one's satisfaction or displeasure. These phrases were distinctly identified with can, could as late as 1525. But on the other hand, already in ME., the verb was often imagined to be different, and inflected as a weak vb. can or cunn (whence cannes, canned; cunnest, cunnes, cunneth, -cunned) and in later times generally con (connest, cons, conned), rarely ken. See Con: the examples which follow illustrate its original form as belonging to can.]

† Can, v.[2] (pa. tense.) Obs. Also 4 cun, cunne, 4–5 kan, con, conne. [In ME. and early mod.Eng. used for Gan, pa. t. of ginnan to begin: see Gin v. In the early MSS. of Cursor Mundi gan and can constantly interchange, but the evidence shows that can was fully established in northern use early in the 14th c., and its beginnings were evidently in the period before 1300, from which no northern documents survive. It was in its origin a variant of gan, apparently merely phonetic; in later times, when used as a simple auxiliary of tense, its identity with gan tended to be forgotten; it was, from its form and construction, curiously associated with the preceding verb Can, and this occasionally led to a forgetfulness of its being a past tense, and to the substitution of couth, coud, could, the pa. t. of that verb. Can prevailed in northern and north midland poets till the 16th c., and in the end of that century it was greatly affected by Spenser and his fellow-archaists and followers. Its main function is now filled by did, though the original gan is still a favourite note of ballad poetry.]

‖ Canard (kanar, kănā·ɹd). [Fr.; lit. 'duck'; also used in sense given below.

Littré says Canard for a silly story comes from the old expression 'vendre un canard à moitié' (to half-sell a duck), in which à moitié was subsequently suppressed. It is clear that to half-sell a duck is not to sell it at all; hence the sense 'to take in, make a fool of'. In proof of this he cites bailleur de canards, deliverer of ducks, utterer of canards, of date 1612: Cotgr., 1611, has the fuller vendeur de canards a moitié 'a cousener, guller, cogger; foister, lyer'. Others have referred the word to an absurd fabricated story purporting to illustrate the voracity of ducks, said to have gone the round of the newspapers, and to have been credited by many. As this account has been widely circulated, it is possible that it has contributed to render the word more familiar, and thus more used, in English.]

Lancashire origin. Can'le, cannle is the Sc. and northern form of candle, and the opinion has been expressed, at least since early in the 18th c., that cannel-coal is really = 'candle-coal'. It does not appear in evidence that the pronunciation of candle as can'le goes back in Lancashire to the 16th c., though such may be the case. A greater difficulty is that it is doubtful whether the original name was not simply canel, rather than cannel coal: see the first mention in Leland 1538. But no other etymological conjecture yet offered will bear examination. The following quotations refer to the derivation:

a 1734 NORTH Lives I. 294 Famous for yielding the Canal (or Candle) coal. It is so termed, as I guess, because the manufacturers in that country use no candle, but work by the light of their coal fire. 1796 KIRWAN Min. II. 52 Cannel Coal. Cannibal (kæ·nĭbăl). Forms: 6–8 canibal, 6–7 caniball(e, canniball, 7 cannabal, 7– cannibal. [In 16th c. pl. Canibales, a. Sp. Canibales, originally one of the forms of the ethnic name Carib or Caribes, a fierce nation of the West Indies, who are recorded to have been anthropophagi, and from whom the name was subsequently extended as a descriptive term.

Professor J. H. Trumbull, of Hartford, has pointed out that l, n, r interchange dialectally in American languages, whence the variant forms Caniba, Caribe, Galibi: and that Columbus's first representation of the name as he heard it from the Cubans was Canibales, explained as 'los de Caniba or Canima'; when he landed on Hayti, he heard the name of the people as Caribes and their country Carib; the latter was afterwards identified with Puerto Rico, named by the Spaniards 'Isla de Carib', 'which in some islands', Columbus says, 'they call Caniba, but in Hayti Carib'. Apparently, however, it was only foreigners who made a place-name out of that of the people: according to Oviedo (Hist. Gen. II. viii.) caribe signifies 'brave and daring', with which Prof. Trumbull compares the Tupi caryba 'superior man, hero, vir'. Calib-an is app. another variant = carib-an; cf. Galibi above-mentioned.

Columbus's notion on hearing of Caniba was to associate the name with the Grand Khan, whose dominions he believed to be not far distant; he held 'que Caniba no es otra cosa sino la gente del Gran Can'. To connect the name with Sp. can, It. cane, L. canis dog, was a later delusion, entertained by Geraldini, Bp. of San Domingo, 1521–5; it naturally tickled the etymological fancy of the 16th c., and may have helped to perpetuate the particular form canibal in association with the sense anthropophagi. See Prof. Trumbull's article, in N. & Q. Ser. v. IV. 171.]

1. A kind of boat in use among uncivilized nations: a. Originally applied to those of the West Indian aborigines, which were hollowed out of a single tree-trunk, and thence to those of other savages, or of pre-historic men, of this construction. b. Extended to those of other races and other construction, and used generally for any rude craft in which uncivilized people go upon the water; most savages use paddles instead of oars, whence 'canoe' is sometimes understood to be any vessel propelled by paddles (cf. sense 2).

The ordinary canoe is made of thin board, galvanized iron, caoutchouc, paper, etc., and like the kayak of the Esquimaux is covered in, except the small space occupied by the canoeist; it is propelled by a paddle having a blade at each end; but so-called 'Indian' or 'Canadian canoes', which are open, and hold several persons, are also in use as pleasure-boats, and are propelled by a single-bladed paddle.

But canon reappeared in the 16th c. and is the surviving form, running together with the preceding CANON[1], so that many dictionaries treat the two as one word.]

1. Eccl. Hist. A clergyman (including clerks in minor orders) living with others in a clergy-house (claustrum), or (in later times) in one of the houses within the precinct or close of a cathedral or collegiate church, and ordering his life according to the canons or rules of the church. This practice of the canonica vita or canonical life began to prevail in the 8th c.; in the 11th c. it was, in some churches, reformed by the adoption of a rule (based upon a practice mentioned by St. Augustine) that clergymen so living together should renounce private property: those who embraced this rule were known as Augustinian (Austin) or regular, the others were secular canons.

From the 'regular' canons, came in the 12th c. those who followed the still stricter rule of Norbert of Premontré, thence called Premonstratensian Canons. These two groups of 'canons regular' were popularly distinguished by the colour of their habits as Black Canons and White Canons. As these vied, in strictness of living, with the monastic orders, the difference between a canon regular and a monk, became in the later Middle Ages (as now in the R. C. Ch.) so slight that the one is frequently confounded with the other. Thus Littré explains 'Augustinian Canons' as 'moines, dits aussi hermites de Saint-Augustin'.

2. In the Church of England, since the Reformation, all canons have been secular, and the system of canons has been retained mainly in connexion with cathedral churches, where the canons, with the dean at their head, constitute the body of resident ecclesiastical dignitaries, who manage the cathedral, and (formally) elect the bishop. (See CHAPTER.)

The name of Minor or Petty Canons is now sometimes given to those clergymen of the cathedral establishment who assist in performing the daily service, but are not members of the chapter. Honorary Canons, are titular members of the cathedral chapter, who are non-residentiary, and receive no emoluments. Cant (kænt), sb.[3] [This and its accompanying vb. presumably represent L. cant-us singing, song, chant (Pr. and NFr. cant, Fr. chant), cantā-re NFr. canter) to sing, chant; but the details of the derivation and development of sense are unknown.

Cantare and its Romanic representatives were used contemptuously in reference to the church services as early as 1183, when according to Rigord (c 1200) Gest. Philip. August. (1318) 11, the Cotarelli of the Bourges country 'sacerdotes et viros religiosos captos secum ducentes, et irrisorie cantores ipsos vocantes, in ipsis tormentis subsannando dicebant: Cantate nobis, cantores, cantate; et confestim dabant eis alapas, vel cum grossis virgis turpiter cædebant'. So far as the evidence shows, the vb. appears in Eng. first applied to the tones and language of beggars, 'the canting crew': this, which according to Harman was introduced c 1540, may have come down from the religious mendicants; or the word may have been actually made from Lat. or Romanic in the rogues' jargon of the time. The subsequent development assumed in the arrangement of the verb is quite natural, though not actually established. Some have however conjectured that cant is the Irish and Gaelic cainnt (pronounced kaintʲ, or nearly kantʃ) 'language'. And as early as 1711 the word was asserted to be derived from the name of Andrew Cant or his son Alexander Cant, Presbyterian ministers of the 17th c. This perhaps means that the surname of the two Cants was occasionally associated derisively with canting. The arrangement of the sb. here is tentative, and founded mainly on that of the vb., which appears on the whole earlier.]

Cant (kænt), *sb.*4 [Goes with CANT *v.4 The sb. (if not immediately from the vb.) may be an aphetic form of encant, or acant*, a. OF. encant, mod.F. encan (Pr. encant, Sp. encanto, It. incanto), in same sense: of disputed origin. The loss of the initial syllable is found also in MHG. and mod.G. gant in same sense.

Diez takes the Romanic words as repr. L. in quantum 'to how much?' as the cry of the auctioneer; and with this agree the occas. med.L. form inquantus, Pr. enquant, and OF. inquant, and med.L. vb. inquantare. But no forms of the word appear to go back before the end of the 12th c.; the earliest and ordinary forms in med.L. were incantus (4th decl.), incantum, incantare, accantare, incantator, accantator; and OF. had enchanteur, enchantement (already in Assizes of Jerusalem). These show that the word was then identified with the Lat. incantare, accantare, derivs. of cantare to sing, in the sense of 'proclaim, cry'. Cf. Du Cange, under date 1351, 'quod incantator publicus dicti castri .. debeat facere proclamationem', and the illustrative 'jussit ergo Moyses praeconis voce cantari'. M. Paul Meyer thinks the identification with cantare too old and general to be explained as an error; and that there is more ground for treating the connexion with in quantum as a later fancy. Cf. also the mod.Fr. vendre a la criée to sell by auction, and the Sc. and north.Eng. roup, cry, shout, auction, 'selling of goods by an outcry' (Phillips 1678)].

App. the same word as mod.Du. kant 'neat, clever', in phr. kant en klaar quite ready; also East Fris. kant; considered by Franck to have been developed out of the sb. kant edge, etc. (see CANT *sb.*1); cf. the connexion of idea in 'keen' and 'edge'. The actual historical relation between the Low German and the northern English word does not appear. Hence CANTY, Flem. and LG. kantig.]

Cantilever (kæ·ntĭlēvəɹ). Also 7 candi-, 7–9 canti-, 8–9 cantaliver, 8 cantaliever, 8–9 cantalever. [The spelling candilever found in the 17th c. (if of any authority) compared with the Sp. 'can debaxo de la viga, mutilus super quem capita trabium imponuntur, a corbel in masonry' (Minsheu Voc. Hisp. 1617), naturally suggests some such Sp. phrase as can de llevar, 'modillion for carrying or bearing': but of this there is actually no trace. On the other hand the name 'flying lever bridge' used in A treatise on Bridge-building by T. Pope, New York, 1811, for what is now called a 'cantilever bridge', and the term 'framed lever' used for cantilever in Tredgold's Carpentry 1828, indicate that lever in its ordinary mechanical sense, is part of the word. For the first part we then think of CANT sb.[1], but as to the meaning in which that word might be here used, or the nature of the combination in canti-lever or canta-lever, no satisfactory suggestion can be offered. (Smyth Sailor's Word-bk., has canting-livre = console-bracket.)]

Canvass, canvas (kæ·nvăs), v. Forms: 6 kanivas(se, kanvas, 6–7 canuas(e, canvase, canuasse, canvasse, (6 canvaze, canvisse, canuize, 7 canvise, canvize, canvace), 6–8 canvas, 6– canvass. [f. Canvas sb., in its former spelling canvass, and some of its special senses. The development of senses 1–5 is plain enough, starting from the literal notion of 'toss in a sheet', whence 'shake up, toss to and fro (agitare), discuss, etc.'; but that of the intrans. 6, which appears early, has not been explained. The two notions subsequently influenced each other, and produced connecting usages.

Johnson says 'from canvass as it signifies a sieve': cf. Canvas sb. 2; but no clear example of the vb. in the literal sense 'sift or winnow' has occurred. Yet Cotgrave's explanation of F. vanner 'to vanne or winnow..also to course, chide, canuasse, bayt .. rake up scoffingly the faults or imperfections of others', affords an analogy for such a development; not so the case of berner 'to vanne or winnow corne, also to canuasse or tosse in a siue (a punishment)', which points to the development in 1–4 below. With Johnson's derivation agrees his explanation 'to try votes previously to the decisive act', but this is not historically the original sense of 6, and is either a conjectural explanation, or at most a mixing up of the notions of soliciting and of discussing or investigating. The trans. sense in 'to canvass the constituency' is quite late.]

Caoutchouc (kau·tʃuk, kū·-). [a. F. caoutchouc (pron. ka$_{11}$tʃu), ad. Carib cahuchu (Littré).]

1. India-rubber, or Gum Elastic; the milky resinous juice of certain trees in S. America, the E. Indies, and elsewhere, which coagulates on exposure to the air, and becomes highly elastic, and is waterproof; it is now a most important substance in arts and manufactures.

'Introduced to France early in the last century, but its origin was unknown till the visit of the French academicians to South America in 1735. They ascertained that it was the inspissated juice of a Brazilian tree, called by the natives Hhvé; and an account of the discovery was sent to the academy by M. de la Condamine in 1736' (Penny Cycl.). Chiefly obtained from the Brazilian Siphonia elastica (Hevea caoutchouc) N.O. Euphorbiaceæ, and E. Indian Ficus elastica. But many other tropical plants, Euphorbiaceæ, Apocynaceæ, Artocarpads, and others, yield it in considerable quantity. Chemically it is composed entirely of carbon and hydrogen, but is not a simple proximate principle, but a mixture of substances.

Cap (kæp), sb.[1] Forms: 1 (cappa), cæppe, 3 keppe, 4-6 cappe, (5 cape), 5-7 capp, 6- cap. [OE. cæppe, a. late L. cappa 'cap' (It. cappa, Pr., Sp., Pg. capa, ONF. and Picard cape, F. chape, all meaning 'cloak, cape, or cope'). Isidore, a. 636, has (XIX. xxxi. 3, De ornamentis capitis feminarum) 'cappa .. quia capitis ornamentum est'; Diez cites cappa from a document of 660, and an ancient gloss 'cappa mitra'. Med.L. used indiscriminately cappa and capa (the latter, however, much more frequently), and commonly in the sense of 'cloak, cope'; Chron. Treverti anno 1146, has 'caracalla (i.e. a long cloak with a hood) quam nunc capam vocamus'. The presumption is that the name was transferred from a woman's cap, hood, or head-covering, as Isidore used it, to the 'hood' of a cloak, and then to a cloak or 'cape' having such a hood, and thus to a priest's 'cope'. The sense 'head-covering, cap, hat' was at an early period in Romanic appropriated by the dim. cappellum, -ellus, in It. cappello, Sp. capelo, Pr. capel, OF. capel, chapel, F. chapeau, 'hat'. (The sense 'little or short cloak' was retained by the fem. dim. cappella, capella, It. cappella, Pr., Pg. capella, Sp. capilla, ONF. capelle, F. chapelle, until this received the curiously transferred sense CHAPEL, q. v.)

An explanation of capa, from capere to take, 'quia quasi totum capiat hominem' (because it takes as it were the whole man) is erroneously cited by Du Cange, and many after him, from Isidore. It is really from Papias c 1053; and is manifestly a 'popular etymology' of a late age, after the application had passed from 'cap' to 'cloak with a hood'. (Mahn thinks that cappa may be of Iberian origin.) The evidence of OE. is important, since it points to two distinct L. types, viz. cappa (which gave cæppe, cappe, cap), and cāpa which gave cāpe, cōpe; the latter is also witnessed by Icel. kāpa 'cowled cloak, cloak with a hood': see COPE.

It looks as if cappa, the living Romanic form, was first adopted in Eng. (say from Italy) in its 7th c. sense, and gave cæppe, and that at a later time cāpa, so common in med.L., was introduced specially for the ecclesiastical dress. The latter is not actually evidenced in OE., but it occurs in Layamon, and was in the language early enough to undergo the phonetic change of OE. ā into ME. ō. OHG. (late) had chappa 'cloak with a hood'; so MHG. kappe, MDu. cappe (both rarely in sense 'cap'); modG. kappe, Du. kap 'cap'.

Words to be distinguished are (1) Cap, OE. cæppe, L. cappa; (2) Cap, Sc. dial. form of cop (like tap, stap, for top, stop); (3) Cape, early ME. form of cope, retained in north. dial. and Sc. as cape, caip (cf. early ME. and north. pape, Sc. paip=pope); (4) Cape, mod.Eng., from F. cape, Sp. capa cloak, the same word in origin as 3, but re-introduced in a new connexion; (5) Cape, F. cap, It. capo headland; (6) Cop, OE. cop, copp top, summit, also cup; (7) Cope, early ME. cāpe, Icel. kāpa, L. cāpa. In ME. cape also occasionally appears for cappe, cap.]

Capsize (kăpsəi·z), v. [Origin unknown; app. originally a sailor's expression: not in Bailey, Johnson, Ash, nor in Todd 1818. The first element may possibly be CAP sb.[1]

(Prof. Skeat suggests corruption of Sp. cabezar 'to nod, pitch as a ship', or of capuzar in 'capuzar un baxel, to sink a ship by the head', from cabeza, cabo head.)]

1. trans. To upset, overturn (esp. on the water).

Capstan (kæ·pstăn). Forms: α. 4 capstan, 5-6 capstayne, 6 capestan, 6-7 capstain(e, -sten, 7-8 -stane, 7 -stone, -stang, 7- capstan; β. 7 capsterne, 7-9 -stern, (7 capstorm); γ. 7-8 capstand; δ. 7-8 capstall; see also CAPSTRING. [either a. F. cabestan, also in 16th c. capestan (Littré), or else directly from the source of the Fr., viz. Pr. cabestan, earlier cabestran (Cat. cabestrant, Sp. cabestrante, -estante, cabrestante, Pg. cabrestante):—L. capistrānt-* pr. pple. of capistrāre (Pr. cabestrar), to halter, bind fast, fasten, f. capistr-um (It. capestro, Sp. cabestro, Pg. cabresto, Pr. cabestre, F. chevêtre) halter, f. cap-ĕre to take hold of.

The Fr. cabestan is not known to us earlier than Palsgr. 1530; since the word occurs in Eng. in 14th c., it may have been learned from the shipmen of Marseilles or Barcelona at the time of the Crusades. In Pg., capistrum and its derivatives have the r transposed, cabresto 'halter', nautically 'ropes, cables belonging to the bowsprit', cabresteiro 'halter-maker', cabrestante; the last is also the approved form in mod. literary Sp.; this form gave rise to the untenable conjecture that the derivation was from cabra goat + estante 'standing', ingeniously supported by the known application of the name of the goat in various languages (cabria, chèvre, bock, etc.), to various mechanical devices. The attempt to find a meaning in the word, in English, produced many popular perversions of the second element, as stain, stone, stand, stall, stern, storm, string. Other names were capstock, and cablestock.]

1. A piece of mechanism, working on the principle of the wheel and axle, on a vertical axis, the power being applied by movable bars or levers inserted in horizontal sockets made round the top, and pushed by men walking round, whereby the apparatus is made to revolve and wind up a cable round its cylinder or barrel; it is used especially on board ship for weighing the anchor, also for hoisting heavy sails, etc., and for raising weights out of quarries, mines, coal-pits (see GIN), and the like.

Double capstan, one that has two barrels on different decks, so as to be worked by two sets of men. Phrases, To heave at the capstan, to man the capstan, to bring the cable to the capstan; to rig the capstan, to insert the bars, etc.; to pawl the capstan, to drop the pawls or catches into their sockets so as to prevent recoil, when heaving is stopped; to come up the capstan, to slacken the cable by lifting out the pawls and walking back; to surge the capstan, to slacken the rope while heaving so as to prevent riding or fouling.

Carbinol (kā·rbinɒl). Chem. [f. CARBON + -OL (the ending of alcohol, used to indicate an analogous compound).] A generic name introduced by Kolbe c 1868 for the monatomic alcohols.

Simple Carbinol is methyl alcohol or wood spirit (taken as $COH.H_3$), a compound of 1 atom of carbon with 1 of hydroxyl OH, and 3 of replaceable hydrogen, any one or more of which may be replaced by the same number of alcohol radicals, the name or names of which are prefixed. When only one hydrogen atom is replaced, the carbinol is a 'primary alcohol', as methyl carbinol $COH.H_2.CH_3$= ethyl or ordinary alcohol, C_2H_5OH; ethyl carbinol $COH.H_2.C_2H_5$=propyl alcohol C_3H_7OH. When two atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'secondary alcohols' as dimethyl carbinol $COH.H.(CH_3)_2$=secondary propyl alcohol C_3H_8O; methyl-propyl-carbinol $COH.H.CH_3.C_3H_7$. When all three atoms of hydrogen are replaced, the carbinol includes the 'tertiary alcohols', as trimethyl carbinol $COH.(CH_3)_3$=tertiary butyl alcohol $C_4H_{10}OH$, dimethyl-ethyl-carbinol $COH.(CH_3)_2.C_2H_5$. The nomenclature of the complicated members as carbinols is more simple and definite than as alcohols.

Carbinyl (kā·rbinil). Chem. [f. CARBON + -YL, as in ethyl, etc.] A term for the alcohol radicals of the corresponding carbinols, as Dimethyl carbinyl iodide $C(CH_3)_2.H.I$. (Watts.)

Carbo-hydrate (kā·rbo,həi·dreit). Chem. [f. CARBO- + HYDRATE, q. v.] An organic compound of carbon with oxygen and hydrogen in the proportion to form water. They are divided into Sugars proper ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$), Grape-sugars or Glucoses ($C_6H_{12}O_6$), and Amyloses, comprising starch and woody fibre ($C_6H_{10}O_5$).

CARB- + -OL, the ending of alcohol, benzol + -IC.] In Carbolic acid, a substance more systematically called Phenol or Phenyl alcohol, $C_6H_5{\cdot}OH$, a secondary monatomic aromatic alcohol (consisting of benzol in which one atom of H is replaced by OH), found in the heavy coal oils, and elsewhere, forming, when pure, white deliquescent crystals, melting at 35° to an oily liquid, with penetrating odour and burning taste. It has powerful antiseptic qualities, and is much used as a disinfectant. Hence carbolic soap, etc.

1. Chem. A salt of carbonic acid, a chemical compound formed by the union of carbonic acid with a base or basic oxide. These constitute a very numerous class of bodies, some of which, e.g. Carbonate of lime, $CaCO_3$, exist in great quantities in nature.

Since Carbonic acid (the hydrate), $CH_2O_3 = 2HO.CO$, contains two atoms of replaceable hydrogen, there exist two sets of carbonates, viz. Normal Carbonates in which both atoms of H are replaced by a metal, and Hydrogen Carbonates, in which only one atom of H is so replaced. Thus normal sodium carbonate (carbonate of soda) $2NaO.CO$, hydrogen sodium carbonate (bicarbonate of soda) $HO.NaO.CO$.

Carbonic (kaɪbo·nik), a. Chem. [f. CARBON, or its L. source carbōn-em + -IC.]

1. Of or pertaining to carbon. esp. in certain chemical names, as Carbonic acid, a name originally given to the gas now more systematically called Carbon(ic) dioxide or Carbonic anhydride, CO_2, formerly also known as fixed air, the gas which is formed in the ordinary combustion of carbon, disengaged from fermenting liquors, given out in the breathing of animals, and largely evolved from fissures in the earth, constituting the choke damp or foul air of mines and caves. This is still popularly called carbonic acid gas, but the name Carbonic acid is applied in chemistry to the hydrate or compound CH_2O_3 supposed to be formed when carbon dioxide comes in contact with water, of which the carbonates are the salts.

Anglo F. carcois, carcas (in Central OF. charcos, charcois, charchois, charquois, still dial. in W. of France) answering to med.L. carcosium (see Du Cange and quot. 1450 in sense 1); β. 16th c. carcasse, later carcase, carcass, a. 16th c. Fr. carcasse, ad. It. carcassa (Pg. carcassa, Sp. carcasa) 'carcass'. The 16–17th c. forms carkaise, -keise, -kesse, are app. a mixture of a and β. In mod. spelling carcass and carcase are almost equally common: the Dictionaries from Bailey and Johnson downward give carcass alone or by preference.

(The ulterior etymology presents many difficulties: see Diez, Littré, Scheler, Skeat. It is to be noted however that OF. carcois, med.L. carcosium, must app. be separated from OF. tarquais quiver (repr. med.Gr. ταρκάσιον, evidently ad. Pers. (Arab., Turk. tarkash quiver, arrow-case), although some confusion of the two words may be suspected in mod.F. carquois (since 15th c.), It. carcasso and turcasso, Pg. carcaz quiver. M. Paul Meyer thinks it must also be separated from the 17th c. F. carquois in sense 'mast-head', repr. L. carchēsium. But the actual derivation of carcosium, carcassa, and their mutual relation remains quite uncertain. Diez's suggestion of L. caro flesh, and It. casso chest, breast, or cassa case, trunk, is untenable for carcosium, and not very likely for carcassa.]

It. carta, in same sense (cf. quot. 1816 in 1), a specific use of It. carta paper, leaf of paper, leaflet:—L. charta (carta) papyrus leaf, paper, ad. Gr. χάρτης leaf of papyrus, leaf, thin plate; perh. of Egyptian origin. (It does not appear how the Eng. form came to be carde, instead of carte, which was established in Sc.)

The native Fr. repr. of L. carta was charte; after the introduction of carte from Ital. it was gradually extended to other senses, belonging to charte (as in charte-blanche), or to med.L., It., or Sp. carta, as those of map, chart; card. The Eng. word has had a parallel history; the shape and stiffness of a playing-card being generally present to mind in the later extensions of the word.]

I. 1. One of a 'pack' or set of small oblong pieces of pasteboard, used in playing games of chance, or chance and skill combined: now called more specifically playing-cards. Unless otherwise indicated by the context, always referring in this sense to the particular species of cards which are marked with 'pips' or conventional figures of four different kinds or 'suits', called severally spades, clubs, hearts, and diamonds. The 'pack' consists of 4 'suits', each of 13 cards, 10 of which bear respectively 1, 2, 3, etc. (up to 10) pips all of one form, and the remaining 3 have habited figures called 'King', 'Queen' and 'Knave', whence they are called COURT (i.e. coat) or picture-cards.
